

WHO AM I?

I design as a way of understanding the world around me. Driven by curiosity, I investigate the relationships between materials, structures, movement and the people who interact with them. Through research, experimentation and making, I translate these observations into tangible experiences that invite closer attention.

For me, making is a way of thinking. Every sample, prototype and material experiment is part of an ongoing dialogue between concept and process, where discovery often emerges through the act of creating itself.

Rather than offering direct answers, I aim to reveal what often goes unnoticed. Whether working with textiles, objects or spatial experiences, I hope my work encourages curiosity, slows observation and offers new ways of engaging with the world.
