

PROCESS

I started off with the manipulation of materials like organza and velvet; both possessing qualities I was looking for, fluidity and reflection.

I wanted to explore many different techniques within the workshops, not only becoming a process with a predetermined outcome, but a semester where I could really learn and develop my textile skills.

I spent a lot of time in the silkscreen workshop trying out every ink, every glue, every foil I could get my hands on. Eventually turning to stamping the velvet on certain areas because of what the heat press accidentally did.

The moire effect became very important, not an effect we see directly in the water, but does conjure up the same imagery.

After all of this material led experimentation, I realised that funnily enough, simplicity is my biggest friend here. What is best viewed in motion are often bigger shapes, larger surfaces, significant areas of reflection. So a garment was made out of fairly "simple" layers, the complexity emerging from the interaction of the layers, and the movement of the exaggerated silhouettes.

The 3 layers were a fitted green dress, providing a neutral background for the layers. Sandwiched blue tulle, making use of the moire effect, and a final layer of colour shifting organza.
