

PROCESS

The first part of the assignment called "I am/You are the messenger", where we had to explore the form of sound in a 2D & 3D sense. The sound would be a song of our choosing. In my case "Phantom Liberty" by Dawid Podsiadło.

The design process began by analysing the formal qualities of the music and translating them into shape language, rhythm, materiality, and spatial composition. Early iterations focused on tall, imposing structures with dramatic vertical elements intended to convey the music's sense of grandeur and tension. Due to the constraints of the plaster-casting process and model scale, these concepts proved difficult to realise physically.

The project shifted towards exploring ornament as structure. A rectangular volume was carved with baroque-inspired forms, creating inhabitable spaces within the mass. When the final plaster cast fractured during production, the failure was incorporated into the concept rather than remade. The broken model became a fictional archaeological artefact displayed in a museum, prompting a larger narrative about lost histories, constructed truths, and speculative futures. This unexpected development became the catalyst for the project's worldbuilding and final identity.
