

the sound of the incoming past

When new dawn meets the doomsday clock, who will warn our successors of the dangers we left behind? Eva van Caem builds on ideas in the field of nuclear semiotics, a school of thought concerned with ensuring radioactive hazard warnings outlast our civilisation. When kinder expressions of danger fail, the line between warning and threat are seen blurred into a visual and auditory monument designed to instil fear in a last-ditch effort to communicate.

